Certain embodiments relate to generating a model of a motion of a hand of a user in a 3D space. 2. Discussion of Related Art A user operates various types of devices in 3D spaces. For example, a user is capable of operating a 3D gaming application in a 3D space or manipulating a 3D virtual representation of a device. To operate these devices, the user typically provides input information by interacting with a device or with a virtual representation of the device. Typically, the input information is obtained by a sensing device, such as a camera, that captures information associated with the 3D space Clifton Castle Clifton Castle is a small castle on the hilltop in Clifton, east of the town of Bath, England. Its design has been attributed to the "Gothic Revival" architect Edwin Lutyens. It was originally built for Henry Addington, a Lieutenant-General in the British Army. The site for the castle was chosen by Lutyens in 1906, after its purchase from Addington by the Bath and West Midland Railway. Lutyens' design for the house was influenced by a 1905 paper by G.E. Street called "A Lecture on Architecture", in which he advocated that large houses should be built with a symmetrical layout and round towers. The house was built at a cost of £20,000, a fraction of the estimated cost of £500,000 for the house. It was intended as a weekend residence, with the railway station below it allowing easy access from the city. The house is now used by the Royal School for Dental Surgery and the London Scottish Rifles.
